ENGLISH RAIL STRIKE

CAUSED BY PROFITEER

Washington, Oct. 11.—The British railroads strike, which has been in progress since last week, was caused by Sir Eric Geddes, minister of transport, and his associates, who have been accused of profiteering. The strike is the result of a dispute over wages and working conditions. The government has refused to grant the demands of the railway workers, who are represented by the National Union of Railwaymen. The strike has caused a severe shortage of coal and other essential goods, and has led to a general increase in prices. The government has taken steps to control the situation, but the strike continues. The railway workers are demanding a 10% increase in wages and better working conditions. The government has offered a 5% increase, which the workers have refused. The strike is expected to continue for some time.
